OLEOMARGARINE AND BUTTER.

Professor De Smedt Again Takes Issue With Professor Taylor on the Sulphuric Acid Test.

The discussion of the tests calculated to discriminate between genuine butter and the spurious imitations of the article by

of THE CRITIC, has attracted general interest among the dealers in and purchasers of butter.

of The Critic, has attracted general interest among the dealers in and purchasers of butter.

A reporter called upon Professor De Smedt this morning and found him surrounded by the bottles, apparatus and chemicals of his laboratory in his room at Police Headquarters.

The reporter asked the Professor whether he had read the communication of Professor Taylor in defense of the sulphuric acid test and whether he had any additional light to throw on the subject.

Mr. De Smedt replied: "I read the statement of Professor Taylor in defense of butter and eleomargurine with care, but regret to say that it did not convince me and I cannot change my opinion. I have made further experiments, and the more complete and careful my tests, the more firmly I am convinced of my former statements of the inconclusiveness of Professor Taylor's tests. It is a well-known fact that butter and the initiation thereof are fats containing many impurities. They contain water, chloride of sodium, very often nitrate of potash, and coloring matter. These impurities exist in those fats in varied quantities, and have all a different effect on the coloration obtained with sulphuric acid, so that sulphuric acid in contact with these fats will produce varied colors in accordance with the existence, absence and quantities of the above-named impurities in butter or its imitations. In my first conversation with you I stated that the coloring matter interers with the sulphuric acid test, and that with colored fats they test all alike, or nearly so. So it is with the presence of a certain quantity of nitrate of potash, which oblitorates the sulphuric acid test. It becomes thus twice that the application of sulphuric acid as a test to the commercial article soiled with different imperities is too crude a method to be employed by experts and chemists."

"I have you made further tests with the acid?" queried the reporter.

"I have made a number of additional soiled with different impurities is too crude a method to be employed by experts and chemists."

"Have you made further tests with the acid?" queried the reporter.

"I have made a number of additional tests," continued the Professor, "with chemically pure butter and fats, uncolored. Among the results of these tests I found the following to be the case: Chemically pure butter or lard produce with the acid almost identical results—first a clean yellow, then orange, then a red fleshy tint, then the purple and brownish, and finally bleaching to a dirty white. Tallow produces a clean yellow, then orange, then a red fleshy color, which is not always clearly visible; then purple, bluish, brownish and finally the dirty white. Butter mixed with lard or tallow in equal parts produces the same colors as unmixed butter. We might conclude this to be a test for fats from the ox, when not mixed with butter or lard; but when mixed, the test is entirely obliberated. All these fats, when mixed with coloring matter and tested with sulphuric acid, retain the dark color for a length of time in the ratio of the quantity of coloring matter which they contain. As to the microscopic test, which continues to be the best test we have for the examinination of butter, it is still defective in its results. When butter has been melted or partially melted, which may happen in a warm room or by the heat of the sun, and under such circumstances the microscope will show the crystalization of the margarine, the microscopist may classify the butter as oleomargarine or mixed with lard. Of course we have several other tests more or less conclusive, but nothing positive, and the most reliable examination, in my opinion, is still by the microscope, polarized light or otherwise."

HILL, OF COLORADO.

Something More About His Political Methods. The Critic last night ran across a wellknown Western politician, who spends nearly every summer in Colorado. Said he:

known Western politician, who sponds:

"Those points you had Wednesday in your paper in regard to Hillare well known to the political leaders of his state. In fact, with all of his cunning he will not keep his mouth shut. He always gives everything away. When he was running for Senator his friends had to watch him. He fell into the hands of a newspaperman during the campaign, and, with his well-known frankness, told him that as he had fornished the money to carry on the campaign, he (Hill) should undoubtedly be chosen Senator, and a great deal more of such talk. In fact, all he ever claimed himself in regard to the matter was that he had agreed to furnish the money for the campaign if he could have the Senatorship. Chaffee and his crowd thought the State was going Democratic and would not put up any money themselves. So they made a bargain with Hill and kept it. It is very foolish for Hill to say there was no money used for his election to the Senate; on a special plea as to buying up any members of the Legislature that might do, but in a general way he made a bargain for the seat and got it. He has a fine reputation in his State as a financier.

"His newspaper management, too, was STYLOGRAPHIC he made a bargain for the seat and got it. He has a fine reputation in his State as a financier.

"His newspaper management, too, was characteristic. When Garfield came in Hill controlled the Denver Tribinac, and the paper became at once one of the reform type, a la Reid & McClure. During the Conkling imbroligo it followed the track marked out by its allies. Arthur was assailed by it bitterly and meanly. The death of Garfield changed things widely different from what had been ever dreamed; but Hill was equal to the occasion. The Republican, another morning paper published in Denver, had been Stalwart through the whole affair. Hill got the control of it and kept the mill grinding out the most ultra Stalwart doctrines. The Tribins never let up its attacks on Arthur. Hill and all his strikers took great pains to deny any connection with it, but tried on every occasion to impress the President and others that the Republican was his organ, etc.

"Hill had better not say much about any frauds in the Land Department. During the last session he introduced a bill, harmless enough on the face of it, but really intended to have a lot of sorip issued in lieu of worthless descart hand in Colorado. This scrip would have been as good as Potters' Field if the bill had been passed. It was cunningly drawn by the best land lawyer in Washington at Hill's own request. Chilcott got onto it and scared Hill so bad that he let it die in the committee and never undertook to resurrect it. I have not got the time now to go into the details, as a gentleman is waiting for me, but some other time I will tell you how I found the whole matter out when I was in Florida last fall. It is very funny."

Getting Ready for Decoration Day. The executive committee on decoration services met last evening, Commander Burdetto in the chair, and Comrade John Cameron secretary. Postmaster-General Greaham has accepted the invitation of the committee to be present at Arlington on May 30. General Sherman informed the committee that the troops from the Washington barracks would attend the services at the Soldiers' Home Cemetery. The various post commanders were requested to invite the members of the Ladles Auxiliary Aid Society to participate in the decoration services. Comrade Truell reported that Hon. William Strong, ex-Justica of the Supresse Court, would deliver the oration. Captain S. H. M. Byers (author of "Sherman's March to the Sea") would read a poem and Rev. Dr. E. D. Huntley would act as chaplain at Soldiers Home. Comrade Wood reported that the services of W. W. Granger had been secured as orator at Congressional Cemetery, Comrade E. M. Renaud has been selected as poet, and Rev. William I. Mc-Kenney, of Wesley Chapel, as chaplain. The committee decided to appoint a subcommittee of eighteen to preserve order on the grounds at Arlington. The commander of Post No. 9 was added to the exeutive committee. Comrade Dillon tendered the services of S. A. Wignin as a poet. Adjourned to Thursday evening, the 10th inst.
